(June 2022) (Learn how and when to remove this template message) Vehicle inspection in Australia is generally done on a state basis (with the exception of Federally Registered Heavy Vehicles, see below). Each state or territory has the authority to set its own laws pertaining to vehicle inspections, all (with the exception of the self-governing territory of Norfolk Island) have some form of inspection, either periodically or before a transfer of ownership. Australian Capital Territory Vehicles in the following categories must be inspected by an authorised vehicle examiner:[1] When registering a brand new vehicle for the first time (usually the dealer does this prior to delivery) Upon transfer of ownership if the vehicle is over six years old Before transferring a registration from interstate regardless of the vehicle's age Before re-registering a vehicle if the previous registration was canceled or expired more than 12 months ago If a defect notice is issued Once a vehicle is registered, it generally will not need to be inspected again if it remains with the same owner. However, the Australian Capital Territory has a random inspection scheme, vehicles can be spot checked whether occupied or not. If faults are discovered, a defect notice can be issued in which case the owner will be required to have repairs made, and obtain a full inspection from a licensed examiner with 14 days to clear the notice. If egregious safety violations are found, the vehicle's registration can be suspended on the spot and the operator will need to have the vehicle towed.[2] Vehicles powered by natural gas or propane must receive a special annual gas inspection.[3] New South Wales Vehicles over five years old are required to obtain an e-Safety Check prior to annual registration renewal or before transferring a registration from interstate.[4] This was previously known as a "Pink Slip".[5] and the term is still used colloquially.[6] Northern Territory Vehicle Roadworthy Inspections for light vehicles (
